

According to the basic demographic information of Section1_Group3, after discussed with our team members, the three characters I would like to choose are George, Logan, and Matthew.

George

Character traits:

Negative: boastful, aloof, changeable, cunning, fussy, impatient

Positive: ambitious, inventive

Questions:

1.sexual identity if not the same as their M/F designation, and, if relevant, sexual preference

George is a programmer in his twenties. He is heterosexual.

2. their relationship status (single, dating, married, polyamorous, etc.)

He is now dating with a designer, but he is also not giving up to date with other girls at the same time. In fact, he is not sure which kind of woman he likes. He feels that he is not ready to start a serious relationship yet.

3. dependents: children, parents, pets, or none of the above. You don't have to tell us anything about these dependents yet. Just think about whether the character is likely to have any, and what category (or categories) they might be. You'll have a chance to change this decision later in the course.

About his dependents, his parents and his pet dog living in another city. He rented an apartment together with a roommate in the city where he worked.

4. Is your character likely to agree with authority or question it? Provide an example of a situation when your character might have agreed with or questioned authority.

George will question authority sometimes because he is always very confident in his own ability and judgment. Especially for his company's leaders, he often questioned their kinds of decisions. For instance, after his department leader completed the explanation and division of labor for a project, he will question the decision of the leader like our team should not accept to develop this type of project, this type of project already has too many competitors, and the division of labor should not be like this. Sometimes His doubts seem to make sense, but sometimes they are just complaints about his personal circumstances.

5. Is your character satisfied with their life or wanting to change it? What are they pleased about, and what might they want to change?

George is not very satisfied with his current life. He often frustrated in team work. George always feels that the other members of the team are not as capable as him. Therefore, he is not willing to help others or work with others for a job. He is always unable to establish a good relationship with others.

6. Do most people who already know your character like or dislike them? Why? Is the character more, less or equally like-able to people who meet your character for the first time? Why?

For those who saw my role, most of them dislike George. They said George feels like someone around them, someone they are very familiar in their office. Most of Georges is too much emphasis on their own strength but lack the ability to get along well with others.

7. Does your character have a hobby, political or social cause, or other interest or enthusiasm that they devote (or want to devote) significant time to? What is it, and why does it excite them?

About his hobbies, George is really like play computer games and view sports games like basketball and baseball. On one hand, in the past, George's family always watch sports game together, and it almost becomes one necessary part of his life now. On the other hand, George found that computer games and sports games are all good social topics. Even though most of the time he doesn't like to participate in various social activities, he also considers it's a good choice to use his hobby as daily social chatting topics when he needs to keep simple social relationships with his colleagues.

Matthew

Character traits:

Negative: belligerent, over-emotional, quick-tempered

Positive: dependable, discreet, impartial, incisive, adventurous

Questions:

sexual identity if not the same as their M/F designation, and, if relevant, sexual preference

Matthew is a FBI agent, 30 years old, heterosexual.

their relationship status (single, dating, married, polyamorous, etc.)

He has been married for two years. However, he is in the process of marital coordination with his wife. They still love each other, but because of his work, he can't spend a lot of time and energy on the family like his wife. Both of them are all quick-tempered, and they often quarrel because of Matthew's work.

dependents: children, parents, pets, or none of the above. You don't have to tell us anything about these dependents yet. Just think about whether the character is likely to have any, and what category (or categories) they might be. You'll have a chance to change this decision later in the course.

About his dependents, Matthew has not lived with his parents since he got married. He and his wife are living in Washington DC to facilitate each other's work. In addition, they have a newborn child. However, because Matthew needs to stay in other cities to work frequently, he often cannot witness the growth of their children.

Is your character likely to agree with authority or question it? Provide an example of a situation when your character might have agreed with or questioned authority.

Most of the time, Matthew is workaholic and he rarely questioned authority. He has always been very reliable and professional at work, obeying any arrangement of leadership. For example, on the weekends, there are some urgent and temporary incidents which need someone to deal with. If his department leader always arranges this kind of things to him, he will consider that the leader really trusted him and reliable on him. He will certainly go to perform the task regardless of whether his wife's opinion.

Is your character satisfied with their life or wanting to change it? What are they pleased about, and what might they want to change?

He is not satisfied with his family life because he does not know how to balance his work and life. He enjoys the process of carrying out his work tasks, but he also feels guilty about not being able to take good care of his family. But both he and his wife are very emotional, they often argue because of his work. He hopes that his wife and he could communicate well to solve family problems together.

Do most people who already know your character like or dislike them? Why? Is the character more, less or equally like-able to people who meet your character for the first time? Why?

For those who saw my role, most of them like Matthew because he is professional at work, and he is also actively trying to deal with his family issues. People who own work experience agree that it is very common to have a problem with balancing work and life. They could totally understand why he encountered this problem.

Does your character have a hobby, political or social cause, or other interest or enthusiasm that they devote (or want to devote) significant time to? What is it, and why does it excite them?

About his hobbies, Matthew likes to practice his shooting very much. First, keep accurate shots is his professional needs and necessary for keeping his safety. Second, he feels that he could vent his emotions during the shooting, and will not let his excessive emotions affect other people.

Logan

Character traits:

Negative: insecure, plodding, tense

Positive: diligent, discreet, sensitive, sincere, incisive

Questions:

sexual identity if not the same as their M/F designation, and, if relevant, sexual preference

Logan is an insurance salesman, 22 years old, heterosexual.

their relationship status (single, dating, married, polyamorous, etc.)

He is still single now. This is the first time he came to a big city from the countryside, he did not intend to start a stable relationship now.

dependents: children, parents, pets, or none of the above. You don't have to tell us anything about these dependents yet. Just think about whether the character is likely to have any, and what category (or categories) they might be. You'll have a chance to change this decision later in the course.

About his dependents, his father died when he was a child. His mother raised him and still lives in the rural countryside. After graduating from college, Logan planned to find a job in big cities and now he is living in a house with three roommates.

Is your character likely to agree with authority or question it? Provide an example of a situation when your character might have agreed with or questioned authority.

Logan will not question any authority. He believes that his countryside growing experience makes his lack of intelligence and insight. Therefore, he is very diligent in learning everything around him. He will accept any advice or task given by the authority. For example, if the leader in the team always asked him to do some basic work like call sales or door-to-door sales, he will consider that this was a learning process and accepted. Even if he encounters unfair treatment, he will complete this task first.

Is your character satisfied with their life or wanting to change it? What are they pleased about, and what might they want to change?

Logan is not satisfied with his current life, especially the quality of life. He just entered big cities and has no career yet. So he has no money to socialize or play. He hopes to improve his living quality through his own efforts.

Do most people who already know your character like or dislike them? Why? Is the character more, less or equally like-able to people who meet your character for the first time? Why?

For those who saw my role, they like Logan very much. They think that he has the rustic temperament. Although he still does not very confident, he is very diligent and very good at learning. Just like a piece of white paper, he has unlimited potential.

Does your character have a hobby, political or social cause, or other interest or enthusiasm that they devote (or want to devote) significant time to? What is it, and why does it excite them?

About his hobbies, Logan has no extra money to support any hobbies, but he is very keen to participate in some free activities in his community in his free time, such as reading clubs and various mutual aid clubs. He wants to know more about the life of the city through these activities, and he also hopes to make more local friends.
